Evidence-based policing

New perspectives of cooperation between practice, education and police science

5 - 8 October 2015

Venue: Edificio-sede Policia Judiciaria, Lisbon (Portugal)

Theme

Ideas on “evidence-based” policing strategies and tactics have gained a foothold in Europe and are drawing growing attention in the international discussion on policing. If “evidence-based” is understood as looking more seriously at the application of sound scientific methods to achieve practical results, police education and training is certainly called upon to support and encompass this approach. National police colleges or universities, for example, are increasingly encouraging and supporting empirical research as the backbone of Police Science Master and PhD theses.

This being a clear trend internationally, the development and progress of sound scientific research informing and shaping police practice or education varies across countries and forces in Europe and elsewhere - what’s high on the agenda in one country can be found to be mostly neglected in the next. The conference addressed the concept, chances and possible limitations of “evidence-based policing” in an open European context. Panasonic Communications Utility aspects on the agenda:
